During the first five years of its operation, the diverse audiences seen at Pitt. Award-winning writers and attracts some of the most race scholars, community leaders, and most popular lecture series at the University, which Reed Smith LLP and Buchanan Ingersoll & Rooney PC, the center is able to offer one of the most popular lecture series at the University, which highlights race scholars, community leaders, and award-winning writers and attracts some of the most diverse audiences seen at Pitt.

By 2007, the center had a full staff, with Davis as director, an associate director, an administrative assistant, and three postdoctoral fellows. Through the generous support of two Pittsburgh law firms, Reed Smith LLP and Buchanan Ingersoll & Rooney PC, the center is able to offer one of the most popular lecture series at the University, which highlights race scholars, community leaders, and award-winning writers and attracts some of the most diverse audiences seen at Pitt.

During the first five years of its operation, the center created its seven core areas of focus: criminal justice; economic disparities; educational disparities; families, youth, and the elderly; health; interracial group relations; and mental health.

Since its inception, the center has been committed to the ongoing engagement of race-related research, as race remains a problem that strikes at the very heart of America.

It all began with an idea. In 2002, Larry E. Davis, dean of the University of Pittsburgh School of Social Work, founded the Center on Race and Social Problems (CRSP) with the generous support of then Provost James Maher and the University of Pittsburgh. By 2007, the center had a full staff, with Davis as director, an associate director, an administrative assistant, and three postdoctoral fellows. Through the generous support of two Pittsburgh law firms, Reed Smith LLP and Buchanan Ingersoll & Rooney PC, the center is able to offer one of the most popular lecture series at the University, which highlights race scholars, community leaders, and award-winning writers and attracts some of the most diverse audiences seen at Pitt.

During the first five years of its operation, the center created its seven core areas of focus: criminal justice; economic disparities; educational disparities; families, youth, and the elderly; health; interracial group relations; and mental health.

Since its inception, the center has been committed to the ongoing engagement of race-related research, as race remains a problem that strikes at the very heart of America.

It all began with an idea. In 2002, Larry E. Davis, dean of the University of Pittsburgh School of Social Work, founded the Center on Race and Social Problems (CRSP) with the generous support of then Provost James Maher and the University of Pittsburgh. By 2007, the center had a full staff, with Davis as director, an associate director, an administrative assistant, and three postdoctoral fellows. Through the generous support of two Pittsburgh law firms, Reed Smith LLP and Buchanan Ingersoll & Rooney PC, the center is able to offer one of the most popular lecture series at the University, which highlights race scholars, community leaders, and award-winning writers and attracts some of the most diverse audiences seen at Pitt.

During the first five years of its operation, the center created its seven core areas of focus: criminal justice; economic disparities; educational disparities; families, youth, and the elderly; health; interracial group relations; and mental health.

Since its inception, the center has been committed to the ongoing engagement of race-related research, as race remains a problem that strikes at the very heart of America.